From the—. Explains how Intizamood Dowlah alias Rezza Ally Sahib becomes amenable to the Supreme Court—it appears that in 1812 the then Advocate-General recommended to Government to require probates of wills or letters of administration of the estates of all natives in cases in which the demand of a personal representative exceeded 1,000 pagodas; accordingly when Intizamood Dowlah applied to the Accountant-General in the character of executor, he was required to obtain a probate which he did, and, in virtue thereof, received certain securities and money belonging to the estate—the Advocate-General thinks it would be contrary to every principle of justice if he were not held accountable to the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court for property of which he has become possessed by means of that jurisdiction and that he can only free himself from his liability by returning the property to the Accountant-General—The right of the Supreme Court, in the first instance, to grant the probate is considered questionable by the Advocate-General and by the Court itself.

The Board have directed Vasalinga Chitty's bales to be released, as it is not clear that any fraud was intended and it was only owing to the negligence of the Collector's servants that the variance between the merchant's list and duty bills and the contents of the bales was not discovered before the certificates were granted—The Board remark that the rules of the 1st May 1820, regarding the payment of drawback, do not provide for the confiscation of goods in cases of fraud—they think that confiscation would not be legal, even if prescribed by those rules, since they are not in the form of a regular legislative enactment; and on this point they recommend a reference to the Advocate-General.—The Board object to the practice of writing in English the lists required by the Collector of Land Customs from persons applying for certificates under Section VII of the Drawback Rules; the merchant should have the option of presenting them either in his own language or in English, and he might then be made responsible for them under a specific penalty.
